Summary

In the modern era, it's becoming more common for women to take up leadership roles. Childcare responsibilities are shared more equally between partners, and women have greater opportunities and scope to progress within their job roles.

Women possess natural skills and abilities that are essential for great leadership. They have emotional intelligence that helps them understand and relate to direct reports, empathy, and support functions that allow them to lead by example. They also have natural strengths when it comes to prioritisation and multi-tasking.

Unlocking these skills and learning how to use them professionally is essential to becoming a good leader and getting the most out of your team. Recognizing and working on development areas is also necessary for creating an excellent leadership style overall.
