Summary

Leaders in any organisation, industry, or public body need an approach to managing teams that is effective in achieving their goals and ethical. The principles behind these methods are universal in their effectiveness.

Managers constantly face new challenges in an ever-changing world, and by applying a range of management principles, they will increase the effectiveness of their actions and the actions of their teams. Studies have shown that the results of highly effective people, including the quality of their work, productivity, and future planning, are directly balanced with how much they are motivated and care about achieving these goals. A leader who isn't motivated to achieve the end goal will lead a team of less effective people.

By applying the three subsets of established principles to manage people effectively, plus creating an effective review mechanism, any team will achieve and even exceed their goals. Practising these ideas will create interdependence in the team and enhance cooperation. Managers and leaders should always use tried and tested techniques to motivate their team by being a great role model, practising the best communication techniques, and collaborating with each team to develop a highly effective workforce and improve the department's quality, productivity, and overall output.
