Summary

Human Resources plays a key role in all aspects of an organisation, from hiring new employees to paying wages to supporting individuals with workplace issues and managing performance.

It is also an HR professional's job to display and communicate all workplace values and ensure employees adhere to them at all times. To practice the values and fulfil the role in human resources, individuals must utilise effective management techniques to understand what people should be doing in their roles and how to get them there, legal practices and processes against company procedures to ensure managers are not performance managing staff unfairly and must also maintain both a privacy policy and open door invitation so anyone across the business, regardless of their role, is happy to air their concerns.

Balancing all of these skills and wearing multiple hats within the organisation can be challenging. It's important to understand the procedures your organisation has in place and always follow these guidelines when advising or supporting others.
