Training Methodology

This course provides a range of practical and written activities to help attendees understand and develop their emotional intelligence and approach to leadership. The course uses role-playing activities and real-life case studies to help trainees develop practical skills and understand how emotional intelligence can affect genuine situations. The course also considers models and techniques for emotional intelligence development, engaging group discussion, and project planning frameworks as effective learning methods.

Summary

As a leader, understanding and utilising emotional intelligence and mastering effective communication styles are essential skills to get the most out of your team. It's important that your direct reports find you approachable and relatable, meaning they feel confident raising issues and suggesting ideas to move forward.

An emotionally intelligent leader can build mutual trust with each employee and easily motivate their team to get the most out of each individual by understanding their drivers and working with key targets that suit them.

Being properly self-aware and able to switch up your leadership style to match each team member will assist you with easy influencing and negotiation. This will allow you to get the most out of your team and ensure your workforce maintains its morale and productivity.

Emotional intelligence skills also help manage difficult conversations and give you greater scope and experience when judging each team member's performance and development areas.
