mutually beneficial supplier relationships. It is interactive, with trainer-led discussion seminars to discuss problems, share scenarios, and find practical solutions. Participants will engage in role-playing activities to practice effective negotiation techniques and will be provided with real-world case studies to determine the best courses of action based on budgeting and continuity. They will be presented with tools to move forward within their own businesses and create an effective action plan.

Summary

Every business uses regular suppliers to provide products for its customers and employees and to support its overall operation. These may be actual saleable items, office equipment such as technology or stationery, or items, services, and platforms that will improve the company's running and growth.

To support the future of your business, you'll need to enlist appropriate suppliers that can adequately fill your needs and agree on a mutually beneficial relationship within your budget. You will need to use negotiation skills to agree on a term-appropriate contract that meets the needs of your business and can be fulfilled by the supplier of your choice.

It's also important to set a standardised process for procurement and fit a contract around this to pull back if there are any problems with supplies in the future to protect your business and secure your investment. To be able to appoint the best suppliers for you, you'll need to undergo research, create a strategic growth plan to understand your supply chain needs going forward and analyse competitive bidding processes to guarantee the best suppliers for your business over other businesses in your field.

All of this requires proper process planning and risk management and the ability to make difficult decisions about suppliers who cannot fulfil your requirements.
